The 2019 Major League Soccer season bore witness to an awakening of angry and politicized supporters who found power to be had when people unite and get organized. After MLS banned political signage in its stadiums and explicitly named the Iron Front logo, supporter groups across the league staged various protests, ranging from defying the ban to a full-section mid-game walkout. This zine collects two articles written in the midst of the season, before the league eventually capitulated to the demands of SGs and dropped the ban.

The league continues to meet with various supporter groups in conversation about how to proceed with further regulation in regards to political signage and human rights issue, so what happens next remains to be seen. But one thing is for sure, and it's that supporter groups have established their collective power through organizing together and staying true to anti-fascist principles.

Want to get involved? Join your local supporter group, start your own, and start attending games! In the spirit of soccer for all, let anti-fascism run free from the streets to the terraces!
